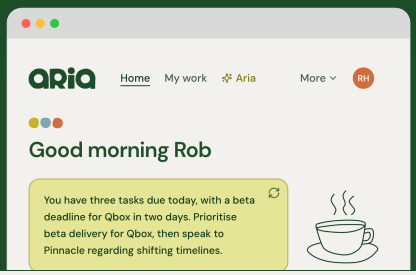
Know your next move

Aria connects projects, people, time and money in one live picture, shows what needs attention and recommends the next move, while there's still time to act.



The warning signs often look like separate problems

Projects run over

The pressure was building for weeks, it just wasn't visible until the deadline

Reporting takes hours

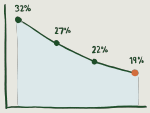
Senior people spend every week pulling status updates together by hand

Workloads get lopsided

One person is overloaded while someone else still has capacity

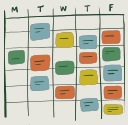
Over-servicing creeps in

A client asks for a little extra and the work grows before anyone's really clocked it



Margin slips

Everything looks healthy until the numbers finally catch up



Meetings multiply

Another meeting gets booked just to work out what's actually going on

On their own, these can feel like separate problems. Often, they're all signs of the same thing: nobody can see all of it at once.

Know what's at risk before it becomes a problem

A slipping deadline doesn't just affect the project. It can put pressure on your people, push up costs and eat into your margin.

Aria picks up on these connections, highlights where problems are developing and explains what they could mean for your business, with practical recommendations for what to do next, with plenty of time still to act.

Built from experience, designed around people

After 13 years leading projects, building delivery functions and helping agencies grow, Michael Gold set out to create the platform he'd always wished he'd had. He founded Aria alongside Rachael Horner, who leads its brand and human-focused UX design.
